A Thanksgiving Lay

By CHARLES STOW

[Copyright, 1935, by Charles Stow.]

IN the wooing and mating time of spring,
When bluebells blossom and robins sing,
By the shy hen turkey hidden away,
To greet May's coming, an egg there lay.

BUT the shy bird vainly seeketh a screen
In distant cover of vernal green,
For a bright eyed lassie pursues the quest
Till she discovers the stolen nest.

A bright eyed lassie pursues the quest.

CAREFULLY stepping, she daintily holds
Her bran-speckled prize in her apron folds,
Till dully and snugly consigned to rest
Under the sitting hen's ruffled breast.

AND the teeming month of June shall see
In the shade of the old sweet apple tree
A top-heavy bantling flutter and sprawl,
Whenever it hears the good dame call.

IN the sultry days of ruddy July,
Roaming afield where the grass is high,
With a plaintive peep and vigilant peck,
Skulks something, principally legs and neck.

WHEN leaves are falling and flowers have fled,
In black and bronze and cardinal red,
With a proud spread tail and a rampant wing
Struts the barnyard's pride, the men's king.

MID the falling flakes of a wintry night
The farmer looms in the lantern's light,
And with gleaming blade and a final flap
A foul deed's done for the poultry shop.

The farmer looms in the lantern's light.

AND gobble that gobbled the early worm
Is feebly gobbled in his turn,
And the egg the shy turkey hid away
Proves to have been a Thanksgiving lay.
